O'PAL. n. ſ. The opal is a very elegant and a very ſingular kind of ſtone; it hardly comes within the rank of the pellucid gems, being much more opake, and leſs hard. It is found always in the pebble ſhape of various ſizes, from the head of a pin to the bigneſs of a walnut. It is naturally bright, ſmooth and gloſſy, and ſhows all its beauty, without the help of the lapidary: in colour it much reſembles the fineſt mother of pearl; its baſis ſeeming a bluiſh or greyiſh white, but with a property of reflecting all the colours of the rainbow, as turned differently to the light, among which the green and the blue are particularly beautiful, but the fiery red is the fineſt of all. This ſtone is found in the Eaſt-Indies, in Egypt, Perſia and Tartary, and in ſome parts of Europe, particularly in Bohemia; but the oriental is much the fineſt. Hill's Mat. Med.

O'PIUM. n. ſ. A juice, partly of the reſinous, partly of the gummy kind. It is brought to us in flat cakes or maſſes, uſually of a roundiſh figure, very heavy and of a denſe texture, not perfectly dry: its colour is a dark browniſh yellow; its ſmell is very unpleaſant, of a dead faint kind; and its taſte very bitter and very acrid. It is brought from Natolia, from Egypt, and from the Eaſt-Indies, where it is produced from the white garden poppy; a plant of which every part is full of a milky juice, and with which the fields of Aſia-Minor are in many places ſown as ours are with corn. When the heads grow to maturity, but are yet ſoft, green and full of juice, inciſions are made in them, and from every one of theſe a few drops flow of a milky juice, which ſoon hardens into a ſolid conſiſtence. Theſe drops are gathered with great care, and the fineſt opium proceeds from the firſt inciſions. In the countries where opium is produced, multitudes are employed in preparing it with water, honey and ſpices, and working it up into cakes; but what we generally have is the mere crude juice, or at moſt worked up with water, or a ſmall quantity of honey ſufficient to bring it into form. The ancients were greatly divided about the virtues and uſe of opium; ſome calling it poiſon, and others the greateſt of all medicines. At preſent it is in high eſteem, and externally applied it is emollient, relaxing and diſcutient, and greatly promotes ſuppuration. A moderate doſe of opium taken internally, is generally under a grain, yet cuſtom will make people bear a dram as a moderate doſe; but in that caſe nature is vitiated. Its firſt effect is the making the patient cheerful, as if he had drank moderately of wine; it removes melancholy, excites boldneſs, aud diſſipates the dread of danger; and for this reaſon the Turks always take it when they are going to battle in a larger doſe than ordinary: it afterwards quiets the ſpirits, eaſes pain, and diſpoſes to ſleep. After the effect of a doſe of opium is over, the pain generally returns in a more violent manner; the ſpirits, which had been elevated by it, become lower than before, and the pulſe languid. An immoderate doſe of opium brings on a ſort of drunkenneſs, cheerfulneſs and loud laughter, at firſt, and, after many terrible ſymptoms, death itſelf. Orpiment. n. ſ. [auripigmentum, Lat. orpiment, orpin, Fr.]

True and genuine orpiment is a foliaceous foſſil, ſometimes found in maſſes of two or three inches diameter, and one inch in thickneſs; but it is oftener met with in ſmaller congeries of flakes from an eighth of an inch to a third in diameter, lodged in zarnich. See Zarnich. It is of a fine and pure texture, remarkably heavy, and its colour is a bright and beautiful yellow, like that of gold. It is not hard but very tough, eaſily bending without breaking: ſome have declared orpiment to be only muſcovy talk, ſtained by accident. But talk is always elaſtick, but orpiment not ſo; talk alſo remains unaltered in the ſtrongeſt fire, whereas orpiment melts readily, and as readily burns away. Orpiment has been ſuppoſed to contain gold, and is found in mines of gold, ſilver, and copper, and ſometimes in the ſtrata of marl. It is frequent in the Eaſt-Indies and the Turkiſh dominions, the fineſt coming from Smyrna. We have it alſo in Germany and Saxony. The ancients were well acquainted with this drug, which they called arſenicon; and though they were utterly unacquainted with the poiſonous ſubſtance called arſenick, yet orpiment has been by ſome very unjuſtly deemed a poiſon; but it appears to be an innocent medicine which the ancients preſcribed internally. The painters are very fond of it as a gold colour. Hill.

For the golden colour, it may be made by ſome ſmall mixture of orpiment, ſuch as they uſe to braſs in the yellow alchymy; it will eaſily recover that which the iron loſeth. Bacon.

It is a low plant, whoſe branches trail on the ground; the leaves are ſmall and roundiſh, of a glaucous colour, and of a pretty thick conſiſtence. The flowers are ſmall, and of a whitiſh green colour. Miller.

O'rrery. n. ſ. An inſtrument which by many complicated movements repreſents the revolutions of the heavenly bodies. O'rris. n. ſ. [orris, Latin.] A plant and flower.

It hath no leaves to the flower, but conſiſts of many ſtamina ariſing from a five-leaved empalement. The pointal becomes the ſeed, which is flat and orbicular, and incloſed in the empalement, which becomes a foliaceous capſule, in which are included two ſorts of ſeeds. Miller.

The nature of the orris root is almoſt ſingular; for roots that are in any degree ſweet, it is but the ſame ſweetneſs with the wood or leaf; but the orris is not ſweet in the leaf; neither is the flower any thing ſo ſweet as the root. Bacon.

O'rris. n. ſ. [old Fr.] A ſort of gold or ſilver lace.

Orts. n. ſ. ſeldom with a ſingular. [This word is derived by Skinner from ort, German, the fourth part of any thing; by Mr. Lye more reaſonably from orda, Iriſh, a fragment. Pearls, though eſteemed of the number of gems by our jewellers, are but a diſtemper in the creature that produces them: the fiſh in which pearls are moſt frequently found is the Eaſt Indian berbes or pearl oyſter: others are found to produce pearls; as the common oyſter, the muſcle, and various other kinds; but the Indian pearls are ſuperior to all: ſome pearls have been known of the ſize of a pigeon's egg; as they increaſe in ſize, they are leſs frequent and more valued: the true ſhape of the pearl is a perfect round; but ſome of a conſiderable ſize are in the ſhape of a pear, and ſerve for ear-rings: their colour ought to be a pure, clear and brilliant white, and they bring their natural poliſh with them, to which art can never attain; it is reported, that pearls naturally of a yellowiſh caſt, never alter, that this tinge never grows deeper, and that the luſtre of the pearl never fades, which is therefore juſtly preferred by the Orientals to ſuch as are purely white: from the name unio given to the pearl, ſome have been led to believe, that there was only one found in each ſhell; this is indeed uſually the caſe in oyſters and muſcles; but in the oriental pearl ſhell ſix or eight are frequent, and ſometimes twenty or more. Hill.

Pulse. n. ſ. [pulſus, Lat.]

1. The motion of an artery as the blood is driven through it by the heart, and as it is perceived by the touch.

Pulſe is thus accounted for: when the left ventricle of the heart contracts, and throws its blood into the great artery, the blood in the artery is not only thruſt forward towards the extremities, but the channel of the artery is likewiſe dilated; becauſe fluids, when they are preſſed, preſs again to all ſides, and their preſſure is always perpendicular to the ſides of the containing veſſels; but the coats of the artery, by any ſmall impetus, may be diſtended: therefore, upon the contraction or ſyſtole of the heart, the blood from the left ventricle will not only preſs the blood in the artery forwards, but both together will diſtend the ſides of the artery: when the impetus of the blood againſt the ſides of the artery ceaſes; that is, when the left ventricle ceaſes to contract, then the ſpiral fibres of the artery, by their natural elaſticity, return again to their former ſtate, and contract the channel of the artery, till it is again dilated by the diaſtole of the heart: this diaſtole of the artery is called its pulſe, and the time the ſpiral fibres are returning to their natural ſtate, is the diſtance between two pulſes: this pulſe is in all the arteries of the body at the ſame time; for, while the blood is thruſt out of the heart into the artery, the artery being full, the blood muſt move in all the arteries at the ſame time; and becauſe the arteries are conical, and the blood moves from the baſis of the cone to the apex, therefore the blood muſt ſtrike againſt the ſides of the veſſels, and conſequently every point of the artery muſt be dilated at the ſame time that the blood is thrown out of the left ventricle of the heart; and as ſoon as the elaſticity of the ſpiral fibres can overcome the impetus of the blood, the arteries are again contracted: thus two cauſes operating alternately, the heart and fibres of the arteries, keep the blood in a continual motion: an high pulſe is either vehement or ſtrong, but if the dilatation of the artery does not riſe to its uſual height, it is called a low or weak pulſe; but if between its dilatations there paſſes more time than uſual, it is called a ſlow pulſe: again, if the coats of an artery feel harder than uſual from any cauſe whatſoever, it is called an hard pulſe; but if by any contrary cauſe they are ſofter, then it is called a ſoft pulſe. Quincy.

QUI'CKSILVER. n. ſ. [quick and ſilver; argentum vivum, Lat.]

Quickſilver, called mercury by the chymiſts, is a naturally fluid mineral, and the heavieſt of all known bodies next to gold, and is the more heavy and fluid, as it is more pure; its nature is ſo homogene and ſimple, that it is a queſtion whether gold itſelf be more ſo; it penetrates the parts of all the other metals, renders them brittle, and in part diſſolves them: it is wholly volatile in the fire, and may be driven up in vapour by a degree of heat very little greater than that of boiling water; it is the leaſt tenacious of all bodies, and every ſmaller drop may be again divided by the lighteſt touch into a multitude of others, and is the moſt diviſible of all bodies: mercury very readily mixes with gold, ſilver, lead and tin, by chymical operations, but not without difficulty with copper and iron; and it mixes eaſily with zink and biſmuth among the ſemimetals; the ſpecifick gravity of pure mercury is to water as 14020 to 1000, and as it is the heavieſt of all fluids, it is alſo the coldeſt, and when heated the hotteſt; of the various ores, in which mercury is found, cinnabar is the richeſt and moſt valuable, which is extremely heavy, and of a bright and beautiful red colour; native cinnabar is principally found in the mines of Friuli, belonging to the Venetians, in Italy, and ſome others in Spain, Hungary, and the Eaſt Indies: quickſilver is alſo found ſometimes in its pure and fluid ſtate lodged in cavities of hard ſtones in the cinnabar mines, and the purer ores are chiefly compoſed of cinnabar in ſmall quantities, mixed with various other ſubſtances: the ancients all eſteemed quickſilver a poiſon, nor was it brought into internal uſe till about two hundred and twenty years ago, which was firſt occaſioned by the ſhepherds, who ventured to give it their ſheep to kill worms, and as they received no hurt by it, it was ſoon concluded, that man might take it ſafely: in time, the diggers in the mines, when they found it crude, ſwallowed it in vaſt quantities, in order to ſell it privately, when they had voided it by ſtool; but too free a uſe of ſo powerful a medicine cannot be always without danger; the miners ſeldom follow their occupation above three or four years, and then die in a moſt miſerable condition; and the artificers, who have much dealing in it, are generally ſeized with paralytick diſorders; however, under proper regulation, it is a moſt excellent medicine. Hill.

Mercury is very improperly called a metal, for though it has weight and ſimilarity of parts, it is neither diſſolvable by fire, malleable nor fixed; it ſeems to conſtitute a particular claſs of foſſils, and is rather the mother or baſis of all metals, than a metal itſelf; mercury is of conſiderable uſe in gilding, making looking glaſſes, in refining gold, and various other mechanical operations beſides medicine. Chambers.
